Ask HN: How to determine HN credibility? - pascal07 I had a look at HN and noticed that few top posts are by "brand name" companies (e.g., Apple), tech giants (e.g., Cisco), or the writer is a established HNER (e.g., Paul Graham, PG). I also noticed that newer and unpopular threads don't get a lot of attention, given the same number of points as older, more popular posts. How do we know HN credibility of any given submission? ===== joshmn You'll get value more by submitting your own stuff, talking about the upvotes and downvotes you get. As an example, this place here on HN posts a metric ton of articles. I'm not saying they're all gold, but you'll find a fair amount of good stuff. My experience with HN was the same, PG is great, but as an everyday user you'll find more awesome links coming from everyday folks. I got more points for my own submission from HN than my employer or the empire. I have an iPhone and I love them because this is what I'm sharing with the world, myself, people I know. I think that's the real value here. ----- gus_massa Look at who is joining the conversation in comments, who downvotes it. (It's easy to detect the posters because of their avatar.) Who comments and asks questions? Who answers? Sometimes the top comment or the questions or answers are close to be impostors. Also, for a submission with a huge number of upvotes/comments, look at the initial few comments. They should be relevant and interesting. (Often, the comments appear by quickly looking for new sources of information and/or contributions.) If the posters are new, make sure they are real people. Sometimes the posters are "impostors". I think there is a problem of too many spam, too many back-handed attempts at discrediting other users (or posts) by pointing to a _popular_ submission with the same topic. If this happens too often and the poster
